This is a 2-day course designed to help students gauge and drive personal performance during personal range days. The reality of life is such that it is unreasonable for most folks to take several courses each year. We spend most of our range time outside structured classes and, therefore, should understand how to get the most from our personal range days.

The course will start with fundamentals and progress through various manipulation techniques, then get into a healthy dose of applying shooting and manipulation techniques in movement. Students will be engaged in discussion throughout this course. This is important as it gives students a chance to think through their performance, identify successes and failures, and articulate (in their own words) why the outcome was what it was.

Engaging in thoughtful discussion when learning a new task or refining a skill is an effective way to transfer knowledge. This lets the instructor know the student understands the information being presented. Giving the student a chance to self-diagnose and explain performance in their own words can also boost a student's confidence during the learning process. Going to a structured course shouldn't consist of a dude talking at a group, running a demo, and then cutting that group loose to run drills for the sake of running drills. You won't leave class a ninja, but you will leave with the confidence to develop and focus your training with purpose and a fluid plan.
