What's a will?

A will is a written legal document.

It names the people – your family, friends, business associates or organization – such as schools, churches, charities that you choose to receive your property when you die.

It may cover personal property – like cash, stocks, your interest in a business, cars, furniture, jewelry, dishes, or your stamp collection. It may also cover real property, which is land and any improvement, such as a house or barn, that stands on it.

Can I make a will?

Yes, if:

you are 18 or older. Generally, anyone 18 or over can make a will.

you are of sound mind. This means you must understand such things as what property you own, how much it's worth and to whom you are leaving it in your will.

You do not have to be a United States citizen to make a will.

What is not a will?

A will is not a letter, a note or a list of instructions about what you want done with your property after your death. It is not instructions about what you want done with your property that you've squeezed into another legal document such as a power of attorney or a living will.

What does a will do for me?

It names your executor. This is the person, bank or corporation that handles your affairs after you die.

The executor:

- collects any money owed you;
- pays your debts and taxes; and
- gives the rest of your property to the people or organizations named in your will.

If you don't name an executor, the court will appoint an administrator to settle your affairs. This may not be the person you would have chosen.

It says exactly who is to receive your property.

Under Oklahoma law, people who are not your relatives cannot inherit your property unless you make a will leaving them your property. For example, if you want to leave money or a personal treasure to someone who is not a relative, like a charitable organization, you need a will to be able to do this.

You cannot disinherit your spouse. Under Oklahoma law, your spouse will receive the greater of the property left under the will or half the property acquired during marriage.

You can specify that your children inherit nothing.

In your will, you must clearly specify that you are leaving nothing to a particular child or children.

It lets you take special care of an older parent, a sibling who is chronically ill or a child who is mentally retarded or is much younger than his brothers and sisters.

It nominates a guardian for your minor children. Your will should say who you want to take care of your children and any property you leave them, in case something happens to you. In the absence of a will, a court-appointed administrator who settles your estate will have to post a bond with the court. This is a legal promise that your affairs will be handled carefully and honestly. The cost of the bond is paid for out of your estate.

How can a will save money for my estate?

When you make a will, you can waive or give up the bond for your executor. If you die without a will and the administrator wants to sell real property, a notice of the sale will have to be published in the local legal newspaper. A will that gives the executor a power of sale can save this extra expense. Without a power of sale provision, your representative will have to get permission to sell your property and then follow a strict formal procedure regarding advertising, pricing and other details of the sale. A will with a power of sale clause will avoid most of these formalities. And, what's more, in some cases, your estate or your family may owe fewer taxes to the federal or state government if you make a will.

Can I write my own will?

Yes. This is called a holographic will.

A holographic will must:

be entirely in your own handwriting, including date and signature. It is best to write on plain paper, since nothing typed, printed or stamped will be considered part of your will. Also, do not have a holographic will notarized.

be dated and signed by you.

specify any children you wish to omit from your will. For example, you can use a phrase like “after due consideration, I have decided not to leave any of my property to my daughter, Pamela Jones.” Without such a statement to show your intention not to leave anything to your child, the court will likely award that child a share of your estate.

No. A holographic will is valid only for the person who wrote it, not for the person who merely signed it. While Oklahoma accepts handwritten wills, some states do not. If you move to another state, check to see if the law allows holographic wills.

Should I write my own will or have a lawyer make one for me?

It is important to have a will with clear instructions of how to dispose of your property. If a will is poorly written, it may cause more problems than if you died without a will. For example, if your will does not clearly state who is to receive your property, it may encourage those receiving less or no property to challenge the will. This, in turn, may cost your estate money because the attorney fees and other costs of defending your will may be charged to your estate. That is why it is suggested that you consult an attorney in order to assure that your will is properly made. An attorney may be able to help you find the best way to handle special circumstances such as protecting the interests of minor beneficiaries, providing for someone with a disability or addressing other issues in the event your beneficiaries die before you do.

Your attorney will prepare a formal will for you. Formal wills must comply with the strict requirements of the law.

What are the requirements of a formal will?

A formal will uses prescribed language to say what you want done with your property. It is signed by the person writing the will and two witness. Laws about signing and witnessing this kind of will must be followed very carefully. If they are not, the will may not be valid. In Oklahoma, the person who made the will must state that it is the last will and then sign it at the end of the document in the presence of two witnesses. The witnesses must sign at the end of the will at the request and in the presence of the person who had the will drafted.

A will must be probated. The witness may be required to be present at the probate proceedings.

Therefore, your witnesses should be people who are easy to find – it's a good idea to list their addresses, be younger than you, be in good health and not be named

What is a self-proving will?

in your will to receive property.

A self-proving will is a formal will that is notarized and contains statutory language. It must be acknowledged by the person who had it made and an affidavit signed by the witnesses before a notary public or a person authorized to administer oaths. The notary seal should appear on the acknowledgement and affidavit.

The main advantage of the self-proving will is that witnesses are not required to be present at the probate proceedings. Because of this important feature, it is now the most commonly used form of formal wills.

Should I make a joint will with another person?

Be very careful about making a joint will. A joint will is one piece of paper that contains two wills. In a joint will, two people say what is to be done with each one's property when the first one dies, and who will get what's left when the second one dies. If both people agree that their joint will is binding or final, it may not be changed later by the one who lives the longest.

There are pros and cons about a joint will.

For instance, suppose you and your wife agree in a joint will that the children are to receive what is left after you are both deceased. On the one hand, this means your wife most likely cannot change the will after you die and leave your property to her second husband. On the other hand, what if the children neglect your wife in her old age, while her younger brother takes care of her? Would you still want your wife to be forced to leave her property to her children? First, it is not true that your property will automatically go to the state if you die without a will. This happens only if you have no heirs – husband, wife, relative, adoptive children – to inherit your property.

It is true that your property cannot go to friends, a charity, or your lodge if you do not leave a will – even if you promised it to them. The law will treat all your property the same. There are no special provisions for heirlooms, jewelry or the family business.

If you do not leave a valid will, the court will distribute your property to your relatives in a certain order set out by law. This is called intestate succession. If you have no will, the laws of intestate succession apply.

According to the laws of intestate succession in Oklahoma, one-half of all the property goes to the spouse and the other half goes to your children.

If you have no children, your spouse gets all the property acquired during the marriage and one-third of your separate property; the other two-thirds go to your parents or, if they are dead, to your brother and sisters. Think of it this way – the law gives you many choices if you make a will, but none at all if you do not.

Does a will cover all of my property?

No, most likely it does not. In fact, a will does not cover some kinds of property at all. For instance:

Joint tenancy property – This refers to property such as a house, car, checking or savings account, held by two or more people as joint tenants' rights of survivorship. When one owner dies, all the property automatically belongs to the other owners and is not affected by the will. In case of joint tenancy, the owners need not be husband and wife.

Life insurance – The money from your life insurance policy will go directly to the person, trust or estate named as the beneficiary. Thus, life insurance policies generally are not affected by your will.

Savings bonds – Certain United States savings bonds are not governed by your will, but go directly to the person listed on the front of the bond.

Remember: All property, including property not affected by your will is still part of your taxable estate, and any taxes must be paid.

Why do I need a will if all my property is joint tenancy property?

It is important to say what should be done with your property should you and your other joint tenants die at the same time. If you do not leave a will, the state must give your property to your relatives in the order set by law. This may or may not be your wish. The same is also true for people who own property as joint tenants,

For how long is my will good?

even though they are not husband and wife.

Your will is good until you change it or write a new one.

As long as your mind is sound, you can change or revoke your will whenever you want to. In fact, you should review your will and consider changing it when:

- your family changes because of birth, death, marriage or divorce;

- the amount of your estate gets much bigger or smaller;

- you move from one state to another; or your executor can no longer serve.

In any case, you should review your will every few years, even if no major changes have taken place in your life.

Remember: If you decide to make a new will, be sure it revokes all your old wills.

Date your will. Your most recent will is the one the court will follow in distributing your property.

What is probate?

Probate is a court procedure that provides for the change of legal ownership of your property when you die. The purposes of probate are:

- to determine your valid last will;
- to safeguard your spouse and minor children's rights;
- to protect your creditors' rights;
- to pay any estate or inheritance taxes due;
- to determine who gets your property; or
- to oversee the work of your executor.

How much will probate cost?

Court costs are charged to probate your will. The estate will also have to pay the cost of publishing notices. An executor or administrator will be entitled to a small fee for handling the estate plus expenses. An attorney will be entitled to a reasonable fee, which will be reviewed by the court.

What if I decide to omit an heir from receiving property under my will?

You will recall from page four of this pamphlet that you cannot totally disinherit your spouse. You can, however, leave nothing to any of your other relatives, including your children. With regard to your children, it is very important that you clearly indicate in your will that you intend to leave nothing to that child or children. For example, if you have three children, and wish for only two of them to receive your property, you can use a phrase like “after due consideration, I have decided not to leave any of my property to my daughter, Pamela Jones.” Without a statement in your will showing your intention to leave nothing to your child, the court will probably award that child a share of your estate.

Will there be taxes to pay when I die?

Both federal and state law can impose a tax on your estate when you die. The two main types of taxes are estate and inheritance. Whether your estate or your property will have to pay one or both of these taxes depends on the size of your estate and who receives it. Your property generally will not be given out until all the taxes due are paid.

Where should I keep my will?

The generally preferred storage place for your will is a fire-proof safety deposit box. An alternative available in some counties is filing the will with the court clerk. Be sure to let your family members or others who need the information know where your will is located.
